It's all about balance, according to Brock & Michele Meyer, an American farm and ranch family. The family land and homestead has been in the Meyer family name for generations, and together, this team is working to build on the legacies of the past while growing the business for the future.

Located just west of the Mississippi River in Curryville, Missouri, the Meyer family raises registered Angus cattle that are sold primarily to fellow Angus seedstock and commercial breeders.

The Meyer's hectic ranch life is one that would leave most people's head's spinning, but together, they make it seem easy. "For us, balance is key," says Brock. "We work together to balance the good times and the bad, and to balance our time of lots of long hard hours on the farm, while also spending as much time as we possibly can together doing things we all enjoy."

Balance is also important in their ranch operation. "We select and breed for real world Angus cattle that perform in the pasture, but still possess the same eye-appeal you would see in the show ring."

The Meyer's market their cattle each April in their own production sale, and also in various Missouri Angus events. For more, visit www.meyercattle.com.
